

Help your Hispanic workers reach retirement

Let's make retirement savings culturally relevant

“Initial participation in our 401(k) plan was very low among our Hispanic employees. So we took cultural differences into account when providing retirement savings education. We now have a solid participation rate. By investing in our benefits, we retain our employees. They produce better results, which keeps our customers happy.”

— CFO, Structural and Steel Products

Culture and language barriers pose challenges for Hispanic workers. Overcoming these barriers requires more than a simple English-to-Spanish translation. That's why we've redesigned our education strategy based on the employee's needs and acculturation levels to create a culturally relevant experience. Every program is built around these five key concepts:

5 Key Elements of Engagement

- 1 Think “bicultural” not “bilingual” – Bicultural is broader than simply using a different language. It means navigating seamlessly between Hispanic and non-Hispanic cultures. Our bicultural education specialists conduct and develop education that truly resonates with Hispanic workers.
- 2 Transcreate, don't translate – We don't translate word-for-word; we recreate messages in a way that retains financial meaning while incorporating cultural relevance.
- 3 Keep it simple – By identifying, developing and integrating cultural elements, we're able to help simplify some of the most complex retirement education topics.
- 4 Adjust to the mindset – Hispanic workers may have unique attitudes toward retirement. We'll help you take that into consideration to provide more relevant information.
- 5 Incorporate the right culture and language – We start with a detailed analysis of a company's Hispanic workforce. This allows us to see the cultural uniqueness of their organization so we can recommend customized and flexible education programs to meet their specific needs.
